""["BMO Objekte" Â· Burning Desire. . .Q: Mercurial for C++ developers? I love Mercurial. I use it for my own projects. However, for work, we currently use: Subversion for C++ CVS for Python and C Perforce for Java Is there any reason not to use Mercurial for C++? A: Here's a few things to consider: You already have a pretty good idea of what problems to expect from CVS/SVN/Perforce: their shortcomings, their strengths, their learning curve, and their support/documentation. That makes it easier to determine if a new version control system will do what you need. C++ developers have already decided what problems they want to solve by using C++. That makes it easier to determine if an alternative will solve the problems you have. You know CVS/SVN/Perforce so well that you will be hard-pressed to find something comparable that was actually created for them. You might have to write your own. If that's your goal, you're more likely to get that done. Mercurial is a relatively new player in the version control space. That makes it easier to believe that other people find it more useful than the other systems you've used. All in all, I'd say you don't have a single reason not to adopt Mercurial. It has many reasons not to adopt you. A: Mercurial is one of the best DVCS out there. My Workflow for C/C++: I use VisualSVN for my personal projects and then convert these to mercurial. I also have two repositories for work (I'm a freelance web developer so I tend to do a lot of work with various clients). For these repositories I use Perforce. Both of these shops understand their use of Perforce and as a result I have never had to deal with any bugs that I can recall. VisualSVN works for Perforce users for their c and c++ code as well as anything else that is tagged *.Net. I haven't had a problem with converting any of my personal work to mercurial yet. A: Here are some reasons why you should use Mercurial over SV
